He’s ready to die, but first he wants to leave some money to help his wife, Debbie, who doesn’t want to be left penniless after his death. But writing down his will takes twice as long as planning his funeral, and he’s running out of time. “We never meant to get so old,” Sanders says. “It’s almost as if we’ve agreed to this, to maybe wind up together in some nursing home.” Sanders, a freelance designer who makes his living on the road, is getting up there in years, though he insists he’s still in top shape. His oldest daughter, a ballet dancer, is 20; his twin sons will be 17 next month. And he’s a bit cranky. AD AD But he worries that his health is deteriorating. He’s anemic; he has trouble getting around. He’s already been to the doctor twice this week. “I don’t want to live like this,” he says. So he’s starting to plan his life insurance, figuring out how he wants the money to go: his wife, his kids, a friend who helped him design his website, part of his medical bills — and his own funeral. Back when he was younger, says Sanders, he wasn’t a teetotaler. He used to drink — “in moderation,” he says — and smoked a lot of pot with friends. But he still wants to die sober and cremated, so he can have a private funeral in a small, dark room. Sanders’s funeral is a “good” funeral, he says, not a “fancy” one, like those he’s seen in TV ads. A ballooning gown is inappropriate. So is something that makes him think of a clown. “I don’t want to be surrounded by a circus,” he says. Sanders knows he’s running out of time, so he
