Adobe's Photoshop is arguably the most powerful image-editing application available. The latest release, Photoshop CS6, was a major step forward, and the software has only gotten better since then. If you must use Photoshop, though, CS6 was a great value. Photoshop CS6 costs around $900 (Editor's Note: Photoshop CS6 is now available , for Windows and Mac) because it comes with a 30-day subscription to Adobe's cloud-based Creative Cloud software. (The subscription for Elements is slightly lower, and probably more affordable based on your skills level.) CS6 replaced the older, slightly confusing Photoshop CS5. Posterized gray bars now grace the application's Rounded Corners dialog. People might appreciate a bit of feedback. ;)

Currently, all of the core Photoshop features are supported, including the classic text tool, the color picker, the node tool and brush contextual menus. There is also integration with the new WYSIWYG editor in web-based workflows to easily insert, edit and save different kinds of web content like text, images, HTML, CSS, and more. The canvas manipulation, layer management, and blend modes services make this a modern, web-based tool to wrap your head around if you're already familiar with Photoshop. The key take away benefit is that this is all performed in real-time and there's no need to download local images from a remote server.

There's also an optional app service that keeps your layers synced. You can edit on your laptop and have those edits reflected on your desktop when you reconnect. That also means I could leave Photoshop open on my laptop work throughout the day and come home when I'm finished thinking about what I want in my next photo, and have everything I've done automatically on my desktop when I get home for the night. All layer edits are sent to the cloud automatically so I don't need to log in to share my photo.

There's also support for converting most file types, including RAW images and video files, which makes for a seamless experience when you bring files into Photoshop directly from your camera apps.
